5. Legal effects of marriage on children

A. Legitimacy and Illegitimacy

Any child born while the mother is married is legitimate, even if conceived before the marriage or by a third party. Also, the child becomes legitimate if the child’s parents marry each other after the birth. Children are also legitimate even if born of a marriage that is illegal (such as a bigamous marriage) or a marriage that is dissolved or annulled. In any case, a parent has a legal duty to provide support for his or her children.

B. Adoption

Legally adopted children have the same status as natural children in all aspects of the law, including support obligations and inheritance. The natural parents of the adopted child are no longer considered parents and the legal ties are cut. However, when the child is adopted by a step-parent (i.e. the new spouse of one of the parents), the child so adopted is still entitled to inherit from the natural parent’s estate. Adoption is not a step to be taken lightly. All of the legal ramifications as well as the procedures should be discussed with the lawyer handling the adoption.

6. Domestic violence

Spouses used to be only rarely prosecuted and immune from criminal laws for most things they did to each other. This is no longer the case, and marriage is not a shelter for poor treatment of each other. Rape (intercourse without consent) is a felony, even if it is with your spouse. Physically attacking your spouse is also a crime and leads to arrest and prosecution.

7. Adultery

When you are married it is a violation of criminal law to have sexual intercourse voluntarily with anyone but your spouse. This is called “adultery.” Even when adultery is not prosecuted as a crime, it is grounds for divorce, and in many cases it can keep the guilty spouse from receiving alimony.

8. What about living together?

No duties arise from cohabitation unless by an express agreement, either informal or written. Unmarried couples may enforce these agreements that express an understanding in the relationship regarding support or finances on the basis of contract principles. An important consideration for people considering living together is the custody of children. If a child’s other parent objects to the living situation in the household, he or she may persuade a court to change the child’s custody or parenting time accordingly. Parents have a duty to act in their child’s best interests in all situations. Cohabitation outside of marriage may present inappropriate situations for children. In such cases, a court will act in the best interests of the child in any time sharing or custody modification. Courts in Virginia still view marriage as being in the best interests of the children.

Support considerations may change upon cohabitation outside of marriage. A court may modify, terminate or refuse to grant spousal support in such cases. Marriage, on the other hand, legally secures spousal obligations and support.

Conclusion

Laws affecting the rights of married people are continually changing. If there is anything unusual about your marriage, or one or both of you have property that you want to keep separate or preserve for your children, getting a lawyer’s advice now may save you great expense, conflict and frustration later. Marriage is the most significant legal human relationship. It carries with it rights, benefits, responsibilities and consequences and is still the basis for families in Virginia.
Marriage in Virginia

1. What is required for a valid marriage in Virginia?
   - You must have a valid marriage license at the time the ceremony is performed. To obtain one, you and your fiancé must sign an application issued by the Clerk of the Circuit Court of the city or county where either of you usually lives, and pay the applicable license fee at the time the license is issued.

   - Your application for a marriage license must be made within 60 days of the date your license is issued. A qualified ministry, judge, or a person appointed by the court may perform the ceremony.

   - Virginia law does not require step-parents and step-grandparents to be related to the children through marriage. Although marriages between step-relations are generally not prohibited under Virginia Code, it is illegal for step-parents and step-grandparents to engage in sexual relations with their step-children and step-grandchildren, thereby implicitly barring marriages between those types of relatives. No such statutory prohibitions exist with regard to step-siblings, however.

   - If you have been married before, you must first obtain a valid divorce in the previous marriage to marry again.

   - You and your fiancé should disclose all relevant information to each other now that may be grounds for voiding your marriage later, such as impotency, felony conviction, religious orders, whether one of you is already the parent of someone else’s child, or other relevant information as provided for by Virginia law.

2. How old must you be to get married?
   - The minimum age at which persons may marry shall be 18, unless they were valid in the state where they took place and if they were emancipated by court order. Upon application for a marriage license, an emancipated minor shall have at least 16 years old to be considered for emancipation. Upon order of the court, a minor has been emancipated by court order. You must be at least 18 years old to be considered for emancipation. Upon application for a marriage license, an emancipated minor shall provide a certified copy of the order of emancipation.

3. Does Virginia have “Common Law Marriages”?
   - No. A common law marriage is one by agreement of two people who consider themselves married without any formal ceremony or license and hold themselves out as married. Such arrangements are not marriages in Virginia, but they will be recognized here if they were valid in the state where they took place and if they were between people who would have been eligible to marry under Virginia law.

4. What are the legal considerations in marriage?
   - A. Name Change
     - Upon marriage, you may change your last name to your spouse’s, but you are not legally required to do so. You may also use a hyphenated surname after marriage. However, if you change your name and records and later want to resume an earlier name, you must petition the circuit court of the city or county where you live for your name change. You may also resume use of your former name as part of a divorce proceeding.

     - In order to keep records straight, any name change should be communicated to all government agencies that might be affected, such as the Social Security Administration and the Department of Motor Vehicles. Further, you should notify your bank, insurance companies, employers, and others of your change in name and marital status.

   - B. Property Considerations
     - Marriage does not automatically put the spouses’ property in both of their names. However, most property and pensions acquired during the marriage (except for inheritances, personal injury awards, property owned separately before the marriage, and gifts from other people) are treated as both spouses’ property in the event of a divorce. State and federal laws give married people many different rights in each other’s property, pensions, and insurance in the event of divorce or death. If you choose to put property solely in your spouse’s name, however, or to title your pre-marital property in both names, that may diminish your legal right to it upon divorce. Virginia generally applies the concept of equitable distribution to all property acquired by the parties from the date of marriage regardless of how the title to that property is held.

     - It is possible for the spouses to change or give up the rights they obtain in each other’s property by reason of their marriage through a written agreement, such as a premarital or premarital agreement. (See “Prenuptial Agreements” below.) Such agreements are in accordance with public policy to encourage and strengthen marriage. A marriage is a serious commitment, and couples should communicate property concerns and considerations to each other before marriage.

   - C. Debts
     - Marriage does not automatically make one spouse responsible for the individual debts of the other if the spouses did not co-sign the loans or credit card applications. However, a spouse may become liable to a third person for the cost of any basic necessities provided to the other spouse by the third person. If you and your spouse incur debts together, the creditor can usually sue either one of you for the entire amount. In a divorce, the judge will divide the debts between the spouses, not always equally. Sometimes this will include some debts that are only in one spouse’s name.

   - D. Insurance
     - All insurance companies that may be affected by your change in status should be notified immediately. In addition, consider changing the beneficiaries of your life insurance policies.

     - Automobile insurance rates may change favorably for you, and you and your spouse may be eligible to combine hospitalization coverage, thereby implicitly barring marriages between those types of relatives. No such statutory prohibitions exist with regard to step-siblings, however.

     - If you have been married before, you must first obtain a valid divorce in the previous marriage to marry again.

     - You and your fiancé should disclose all relevant information to each other now that may be grounds for voiding your marriage later, such as impotency, felony conviction, religious orders, whether one of you is already the parent of someone else’s child, or other relevant information as provided for by Virginia law.

   - E. Powers of Attorney
     - You may desire to give your spouse the power to act on your behalf in the event that you become incapable of handling your own affairs due to accident, sickness, or distant travel. Without a power of attorney, your spouse may be powerless to make decisions on your behalf. A power of attorney can avoid the need to petition the court for the appointment of a guardian for the disabled spouse.

     - Powers of attorney can be designed to be effective only when certain specified conditions exist. The person granting the power of attorney can revoke the power at any time, so long as he or she is mentally competent. You should consult your attorney to determine whether a power of attorney would be appropriate in your case, and if so, what the scope of such power should be.

   - F. Support Obligations
     - In marriage, spouses are mutually responsible for the support of each other. In certain circumstances, Virginia law provides for support in the event of divorce or death. If either of you has been placed in a financially dependent position by the marriage, the partner with the earning power or financial means may be ordered to contribute to the support of the financially dependent partner. Therefore, even though a marriage must be built on faith, both spouses should closely examine the plans for each of their respective roles in the marriage and the possible consequences of this arrangement in the event of separation or divorce.

   - G. Wills and Estate Planning
     - It is never too early to write a will. Even though you may be young or have few assets, it is wise to consult a lawyer about estate planning. It is not how much you have but where you want your property to pass upon your death that is important. Proper estate planning helps protect your family from unnecessary financial hardships that might occur after your death. If you die without a will, your entire estate will pass to your spouse under Virginia law unless you have children by a previous marriage. If both you and your spouse die without a will, your underage children’s share of your estate could be tied up in guardianship and might not be readily available for support and education.

     - If you had a will before marriage, it is important that it be reviewed in light of your changed status. For more details, ask for the brochure titled Wills in Virginia published by the Virginia State Bar.

H. Premarital Agreements

   - In some instances, you and your fiancé may wish to enter into a written prenuptial or premarital agreement. (If such an agreement is made after the wedding, it is called a postnuptial agreement.) This contract, which is legally binding if it is properly and entered into voluntarily with full disclosure, can set out duties and obligations of each spouse and establish the rights each will have in the property of the other and of both of them. It can guarantee a level of support in the event of separation or divorce, or it can specify that there will be no alimony.

   - Such contracts are especially important in a subsequent marriage, where one spouse may have children from a previous marriage and obligations that will continue after that prior marriage. That person might also want to provide for these children in the sharing of his or her estate and not want the new spouse to have all of the rights that might be given by law in the absence of a premarital contract. This is especially true when the parties are remarrying late in life for companionship and do not want all of the legal entanglements that would otherwise be involved in marriage. You should consult a lawyer if you think you might need such an agreement.

I. Taxes

   - As a married couple you can file a joint income tax return with both the state and federal governments if you were married by the end of the tax year. A joint return can often save you money, but its advantages depend on each couple’s individual financial situation. Some married taxpayers are better off filing separate returns. Consult a tax expert on these matters.
